Retributive philosophies play an important role in American criminal justice, providing both justifications for and constraints on the exercise of the state's criminal justice powers, and bolstering the popular and political legitimacy of our punishment practices. But retributivism has long been subject to robust challenges on a number of different fronts, from the pragmatic to the metaphysical, and critics have sometimes suggested that we may eventually move beyond retributivism to a post-retributive paradigm for criminal justice. In a recent paper (Radicalized Risk Assessment, J. Behav. Sci. & L. (forthcoming 2018)), I have argued that the colonization of criminal justice by social-science-informed risk assessment methods will eventually contribute to the demise and replacement of the retributive approach. It will do so not just because such risk assessment naturally resonates with consequentialist approaches to criminal justice (like incapacitation and rehabilitation), but also because the particularistic criminogenesis narratives it can fund will catalyze deep anxieties about retributivism itself. In this paper, I develop this thesis further by documenting several ways in which an influential instance of social-science informed risk assessment technology, the Correctional Offender Management Profiling for Alternative Sanctions (COMPAS) device, both incorporates and funds post-retributive attitudes toward criminal justice. I analyze the COMPAS device itself and the wealth of supporting materials that accompany that device, and look to how theorists and practitioners have conceptualized the use of that device. On the basis of this analysis, I argue that COMPAS both explicitly and implicitly embraces the development and dissemination of highly particularized, social-science derived, information about criminogenetic influences on criminal actors. Moreover, in so doing, it sets the stage for (and favors) the development of highly concrete, detailed, accessible, and plausible social-science-informed criminogenesis narratives. The dissemination of such narratives within the justice system will present an incremental challenge with significant cumulative impact on the retributive intuitions of justice system agents. As a result, I argue, the proliferation of COMPAS assessment (and other assessment devices) will ultimately be corrosive to the justice system's retributive commitments. In this way, it will help steer the justice system's trajectory to post-retributive modes of criminal justice.

049. Mental Reinstatement of Context, Timeliness and Step-Wise Technique, Enhancing Corroboration Memory, Missing Persons Recovery

3:00pm - 4:00pm
Galleria South

Right Place, Wrong Time: The Limitations of Mental Reinstatement of Context for Alibi Elicitation

Stephanie A. Cardenas, MA/MS, John Jay College of Criminal Justice & the Graduate Center, CUNY; William E. Crozier, PhD, Duke University; Deryn Strange, PhD, John Jay College of Criminal Justice

Studies show that 33%-53% of innocent suspects struggle with generating uniformly accurate and unchanging alibis (e.g., Olson & Charman, 2012; Strange, Dysart, & Loftus, 2014). Mental reinstatement of context (MRC) is regarded as an effective mnemonic component of the cognitive interview used by law enforcement interviewers to improve eyewitness memory accuracy (Memon, Meissner, & Fraser, 2010). Using a novel, ecologically valid five-stage paradigm we examined whether MRC led to more accurate and consistent alibi memories and corroborating evidence compared to time-cue based questioning. Results suggest that MRC does not improve alibi generation over time-cueing alone.

Memory for Timelines: Testing the Step-Wise Alibi Elicitation Technique

Alexis T. Mook, BA/BS, Florida International University; Steve Charman, PhD, Florida International University, Miami

Using a novel alibi paradigm, we examined innocent suspects' memories for a series of actions over one hour. At Time 1, participants engaged in a variety of tasks at different locations. One week later, participants were interviewed regarding their activities during the event stage using one of three interviewing techniques. Initial alibis generated were highly inaccurate. Preliminary analyses found no effect of interviewing condition on report accuracy. However, an effect of report modality was found such that the completion of a physical timeline lead to more accurate reports than verbal reports on measures of chronology, duration and objective time.

Enhancing Memory for Corroborating Alibi Evidence

Kureva Matuku, MA/MS, Florida International University; Steve Charman, PhD, Florida International University, Miami; Osvaldo Sarduy, BA/BS, Florida International University, Miami

Innocent suspects often have to provide alibis to prove their innocence. These alibis are often wrong, thereby endangering innocent suspects to potential wrongful arrests and convictions. Even when they produce accurate alibis, these tend to be weak because they lack supportive physical evidence. This research investigates an intervention aimed at increasing memory for supportive alibi evidence by leveraging chronological recall and perspective-taking techniques. Study 1 tests the effect of this intervention on the quantity of physical evidence recalled. Study 2 investigates the degree to which innocent suspects overestimate the strength of corroborating physical evidence.

The Recovery of Missing Persons

Kara Moore, PhD, Knox College

Researchers have been studying how citizens search for
